OHICAGO, Sept. 3.—Writing prescriptions for whiskey is no child's work, according to Dr. M. H. Fash, who was called before C. A. Stone, prohibition director for Illinois, to show cause why his license to issue prescriptions for liquor should not be revoked.

'I started writing prescriptions at 7 A. M. and worked twelve hours without rest," he said. "My lunch was sent to the office and I ate while I worked." He admitted writing 308 prescriptions in one day and said he wrote 700 in four days. The usual fee is $2.

CHAPTER XIL

66 HAD that, too," nodded Jack-

"My boss ordered a sobstory about the missing girl, and intimated that she and O'Connor were mixed up and that she repeated and heat it with him after sending in the story," grinned the representative of the sensational paper. It ought to be on the street Low, with a picture of O'Connor.

Paulding, who took an adjacent booth. The other men left the coffee-house and went back to their bifices. "Jackson," growled the bity editor, "it's a crime. Perfectly good story just waiting to be written, and you haven't a line on it."

viewed the world, at least whitever part of it he could see as the car rushed along the turnpike, with disapproval. Van Winkle was perfectly sober, For, as Whiting had explained to Howard a few moments before, "While Van is among the first of the casualties in an salcoholic battle, his recovery is speedy and certain." Even though his head had been muffled enough of the damp marsh air had reached him to effect the change.

I remember seeing her. It was about ten miles from Newark. And here's Newark; I'll take the wheel." Whiting quickly made room for his friend.

"Drive like" the dickens, Van," had admonished. "We've got to clear Jos. and they have his girl."
Hy this time. O'Connor had become thoroughly aroused. His apparent supor in the District Attorney's office had been due to the realization of his helplessness; now that the action "Of course, that's all rot," asserted Jackson irritably, "Well," he added with a shrug of the shoulders, "here goes—a blind aliey after the boss has spoiled my night off."

He went to the phone, followedsby Paulding, who took an adjacent his mind rushed a thousand fancies, some of hope, some of despair, and the result was a fierce desire to do something himself. The car shot past the quiet Jersey villages, and the headlight brought forth from the darkness a dazzling, serpentine thread of highway, which seemed to twist and lead to nowhere. As the moon waned, the darkness of early morning became intensified. O'Connor longed to leas-to the Yonkers boundary it was wondering what Assistant District Attorney O'Connor had done and whither the pretty reporter, Miss Billingsley, had gone. When the only enlightenment afforded by the atternoon paper was a picture of the missing reporter with an editorial misurance of the accuracy of the story, the city shook its head resignedly and waited for Monday, with its half hourly newspaper editions to come.

Horace Van Winkle poked his fead from the robe which covered him and viewed the world, at least whatover part of it he could see as the car rushed along the turnpike, with discontinuous and in bed, I s'pose," replied the man, who was evidently not blessed with unusual intelligence. "Answer me directly," ordered Whiting. "Can you take me to him?" "Could 'I I had to, I s'pose," "Well, you have to. Get on a coas and went for his coat. In about two minutes there came a shout from Van Winkle. "Come on, Bill: I've got him," and Whiting ran back to the car to find already essated the veterinary who lived at the other side of the station, and who was more no-customed to impromptu awakenings.

As the car turned, the party saw As the car turned, the party saw on the plazza the figure of the other man, draped in a black coat, beneath which extended the white edge of his nightshirt. He shouted as the ma-

"Too slow for us. We're a fast moving crowd, eh, Joe?" inquired Whiting, who was now in the ton-

O'Connor smiled somewhat grimly, "Where am 1?" he murmured sadly and most unoriginally: "and where are those infernal cops who tried to murder me?"

"You are nearly in Newark; it is
